CHRISTIAN TRACTS

(AT REDUCED PRICES.)

MESSRS. WELLS & LILLY have reprinted the series of Moral and Religious Tracts originally published by the English Christian Tract Society. These Tracts have been much approved, and extensively circulated in England. They are extremely well adapted to arrest the attention and improve the hearts of Children and young people, as well as of persons of the lower classes; uniting, in a remarkable degree, interesting narrative with the most serious inculcation of moral and religious principles.

The following recommendation of these Tracts will be found in the Christian Disciple, Vol. ii. for September and October.

"The religious community have cause to feel much indebted to our publishers, for putting them in possession of this admirable collection of moral and religious tracts. A work of this nature has hitherto been a desideratum. Some of the religious tracts in circulation are of decidedly injurious tendency, and, if there were no antidote in their stupidity, we should fear might exert a pernicious effect on the public sentiment. In others, as in some of the publications of Miss More, erroneous opinions are so intimately blended with just, and such a charm thrown over them by the power of the writer, as not unfrequently to leave us doubtful whether the impression likely to be produced is such as we could conscientiously encourage; whether most good is likely to be done by the just views, or evil by the wrong. The republication of the Christian Tract Society's collection takes away all excuse for circulating bad tracts for want of better. This collection makes a work very near to perfect in its kind. It consists of dialogues, essays, addresses, and in great part of fictitious narratives, which, besides the moral they possess as specimens in that kind of composition, which is not small, have that of enforcing with great felicity and power, each of them some important religious truth. The stories of William's Return, and of Good Luck and Good Conduct, for example, are in the very best style of works of this nature. We recommend it with perfect confidence to heads of families, who wish to put into the hands of children and dependants a work suited at once to interest, and in the most important respects to profit them."

The Publishers are induced to offer them at one half of the former prices; which were already at a very moderate advance.

These Tracts are comprised in five volumes. When delivered bound, 25 cents a volume will be charged for the binding.
